The Young Fox Gets Away

By Thornton W. Burgess

He only who has freedom lost May hope to fairly count the cost. -Old Mother Nature. The young Fox, who was Farmer

Brown's Boy's prisoner, had been a prisoner so long that he was almost happy. You see, Farmer Brown's Boy was very, very good to him. They Boy was very, very good to him. They were the best of friends. But no one can be a prisoner and be wholly happy. The young Fox had plenty to eat and nothing to worry about. He had a comfortable home and nothing to do. That seems to be the idea of happiness with some people. But it was not the young Fox's idea of happiness. He never could quite forget for even a single little minute that he was a prisoner. Sometimes when e was a prisoner. Sometimes when he was a prisoner. Sometimes when there was no one around he would lie for hours, looking out across the Green Meadows, over to the Green Forest and the Old Pasture, with such longing in his eyes that I am sure Farmer Brown's Boy would have taken pity on him had he seen him.

Then very early one morning, before any one was astir in Farmer.

rarmer Brown's Boy would nave taken pity on him had he seen him.

Then very early one morning, before any one was astir in Farmer Brown's house, the young Fox made a discovery. The staple which held the chain by which he was fastened to a post had become loose. The young Fox tugged at the chain and it seemed to give a little. He kept tugging and tugging and tugging. At last that staple pulled out. It pulled out so suddenly that the young Fox fell right over on his back. When he got to his feet he discovered that he was free. Yes, sir, he was free. To be sure, that chain was still fast to his collar, but it was no longer fast to that post.

The young Fox trembled all over with excitement. At first he moved very slowly. You see, he kept expecting to be brought up short by that hateful chain. But soon he discovered that that chain no longer held him. He moved faster. Then he began to trot. Then he ran. Straight for the Old Pasture he headed. How good it was to run again! How glorious it was to feel that he could go where he pleased! That hateful chain still dragged behind him, but in the joy of his freedom he hardly gave it a thought. Across the Green Meadows he ran and there was nothing.
